General Description

INFJs possess a rich and complicated inner world that they express through a quiet and organized caring for others. They are quick to understand people and although they may not express their insights freely, they deeply care about their friends and want the best for them. INFJs like to have a group of friends who will appreciate their inner depth and share their desire to help others. Without this group, they may feel lonely. INFJs broad inner focus usually gives them an ease with theoretical and conceptual subjects, and many INFJs find themselves going on to university, often to become teachers.

INFJ Ideal Work Environment

- Flourishes in an atmosphere of co-operation and harmony
- Enjoys freedom from control and detail
- Focuses attention on people, not paperwork or rules
- Appreciates feedback and public recognition of contributions
- Team focused and enjoys team problem-solving and discussions
- Needs to be in a job that enhances personal growth and self-awareness and interactions or relationships with others

This personality profile is based on the work of C.G. Jung, whose theories principally developed popular psychometric instrument, the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator. Jung proposed that people have personality preferences similar to being right- or left-handed. Understanding personality preferences can provide insight into your behaviour and help with decision-making.

What do the letters mean?

First Preference: Extraversion or Introversion (E or I)

People with a preference for Extraversion focus their attention outwards and are drawn to the external world of action. They tend to be more talkative and their interests more varied.

People with a preference for Introversion focus their attention inwards and are drawn to the inner world of understanding. They tend to be more thoughtful and their interests are deeper.

Second Preference: Sensing or iNtuition (S or N)

People with a preference for Sensing learn about their world through experience. Because they focus on what they have seen or heard or touched, they develop a practical and realistic outlook on the world.

People with a preference for iNtuition go beyond their direct experience and focus on the meaning of the information. This gives them a "big picture" outlook on life and they tend to be more creative and innovative.

Third Preference: Thinking or Feeling (T or F)

People with a preference for Thinking make decisions based on impersonal criteria like principles and logic. They apply the same rules to everyone making them fair and businesslike, asking: "Is this decision logical? Can I support the decision with facts?"

People with a preference for Feeling make decisions based on their own personal values. Because they treat everyone individually, they tend to be more empathetic and compassionate, asking: "How do I feel about this decision? What will be the consequences for those involved?"

Fourth Preference: Judging or Perceiving (J or P)

People with a preference for Judging are not necessarily judgmental; rather they want their lives to be predictable so they make decisions quickly. Judging-types tend to be organized.

People with a preference for Perceiving want their lives to be open to new experiences so they postpone decisions. Perceiving-types tend to be spontaneous.
